Citizenship and its various Discourses

Prof. Gyanaranjan Swain
Professor
Dept. of Political Science
G.M University

Citizenship discourse refers to the discursive practices of members of a society and the study hereof. Citizens' access to and engagement with civic life are issues that have long, and increasingly, occupied scholars, politicians, and educators alike. Citizenship discourse designates the particular aspect of this endeavor that has to do with how society as a whole and citizens individually or as a group understand and take on their role as citizens with a "voice" and a measure of agency. The term thus refers both to (1) discourse about citizenship, and (2) discourse enacting citizenship.

Now the idea of citizenship has been in the domain of intellectual discussion for many centuries. Various changes in the contemporary society deeply contribute to the revival of the concept of citizenship. The term and notion of citizenship raise some concerns in the field of social sciences and encompasses a wide range of sociological, political and global attributes and characteristics.

The question of citizenship has been on the agenda of politicians, policy makers and civic organizations over the past decades in the field of education and more widely. Traditionally, the concept of citizenship referred to a relation between the individual and the state, guaranteeing citizens the legal status as full members of society with certain rights and obligations. More recently, the notion of citizenship has come to focus not only on the legal dimensions of citizenship but also on those that are social, political, cultural and global. Citizenship is no longer conceived only in terms of a legal relation between the individual and the state, but more often as a 'total relationship, inflected by identity, social positioning, cultural assumptions, institutional practices and sense of belonging'. Correspondingly, educating for citizenship not only concerns the development of formal knowledge of rights and duties, but also identity formation that covers political, cultural, economic and working life.

The scope of the concept of citizenship is definitely broad and encompasses perspectives from the different fields of social sciences. Citizenship can be defined using different views on its various aspects. The revival of the issue concerning the notion of citizenship was brought about by several factors that create changes in the structures of society. As a result, there exists a disparity on how the level of citizenship of an individual is determined based from the various determinants.

WOMEN AND CITIZENSHIP

Dr. Sikata Panda

Associate Prof. of Pol. Science
G.M University, Sambalpur

Citizenship refers to either active or passive participation of individual in a political community for the enjoyment of basic privileges. It is an important concept irrespective of the nature of political system. It has its root since the Greek period. Today, in the globalized world when the access to communication has expanded the scope of mobility of people, the conventional notion of citizenship based on territorial boundary sounds anachronistic. Recently, in India the concept was in the limelight in the context of approval of the Citizenship Amendment Act. The law has denied citizenship to people of a particular community after a certain period. It has not only put a question mark on the secular character of the Indian political system but also has raised doubt over the democratic nature for pushing women, already a vulnerable section of the society to the periphery further. The issue has raised the debate over "gendered citizenship".

No doubt modernity talks about egalitarianism, yet inclusive citizenship was far from reality. Both Locke and Rousseau, pioneers of Enlighten Movement justified subordination of women on different grounds. It led to rise of three waves of feminism in the West which talked about women suffrage, dismantling of patriarchy and removal of public-private dichotomy. Grant of universal suffrage in England in 1928 and passing of the nineteenth amendment in USA in 1920 reaffirmed the patriarchal mindset of developed countries.

Demand for citizenship for women coincided with struggle for freedom when the Indian political system got the exposure of modernization. The women suffrage movement was initiated by Annie Besant, Sarojini Naidu, Margaret Cousins etc. As a result, women in India got voting right in the early twenties at a limited level. The 1935 Act introduced reservation for India in the Provincial Legislative Assemblies with a hidden agenda of dividing women participation. But, it provided scope for women participation in the public domain. Finally, the Constituent Assembly approved the motion of Universal adult franchise in 1949 and incorporated it under Article 326. It paved the way for women political participation at all level apparently on equal terms and conditions.

After more than seventy years of independence and promulgation of the Constitution, it has been found that women citizenship to be a hoax. A citizen normally reflects himself through contesting in election, assuming political posts thereafter, campaign for political parties and participating in the political process. Milbraith summarizes them as gladiatorial, transitional and spectre activities. In all these fields women citizen remain far behind the male counterparts. No doubt, there has been a rise in women voters turn out due to spread of education and implementation of the 773rd amend act, yet proxy participation of women at the lowest level can not be ruled out. The apprehension of denial of voting right to a large number of women after the implementation of CAA indicates vulnerabilities of womwn citizenship in India. Role of women in term of their association with political parties is also far from satisfactory. Lastly, at the top most level manifestation of women participation is quite dismal. The conviction of lack of winning ability of women contributes to such a tendency. Resistance to the Women Reservation Bill and demarcation of less important portfolio for women are reflective of it.

Thus citizenship for women in India to be at par with their male counterparts needs a long way to go. Implementation of Women Reservation Bill and change of mindset through a uniform and comprehensive system of education may be the need of the hour.
